What Crypto Trading Is Similar To

Whether you like the volatility of futures trading, the flexibility of options, or owning the underlying asset like stocks, different markets appeal to different traders. If you're looking for a bit of a blend, here's what crypto has to offer you:

- The flexible, 24-hour trading of forex
- The volatility of futures
- Owning the underlying—like stocks.

What Makes Crypto Unique

When you first start trading crypto, it can feel like the wild west. Between the high volatility, 24/7/365 market, and new coin drops, crypto has a lot going on even for seasoned traders. But trading crypto also has a few key, and potentially appealing, differences from traditional markets:

1. They're digital assets, so you can easily trade and transfer crypto anywhere on the globe in moments
2. It's decentralized, so no central issuing authority has oversight over the coins you own
3. Supply can be limited. Select crypto tokens, like Bitcoin and Litecoin, have maximum supply caps so you know how many will be mined over their lifetime.
4. They're not backed by governments or banks. The value of your coins is primarily driven by market forces, speculation, and their perceived utility.
5. Crypto trading is still relatively young. New legislation, like the GENIUS act, is just starting to shape the crypto market and bring new traders and institutions in.
